A wide variety of physical and chemical properties need to be considered before assessing the risk of developing respiratory disease following aerosol exposure to a high-density polymers (HDP) suspension. For such purposes it is important to identify possible health hazards associated with inhalation of HDP. Four different HDP suspensions were generated by suspending polymeric particles in water, with a size fraction of 60-90 and 210-350 nm for fine and coarse particles, respectively. The results indicated that the size and number concentration of the HDP aerosol particles did not vary significantly, and that the surface area and the mass concentration of the HDP suspensions were much lower than those of the monodisperse suspensions used in our previous study. To determine if HDP aerosols induce inflammation, we exposed human subjects for 4 h to aerosols generated by each HDP. No subjects developed any signs or symptoms of pulmonary effects, as determined by an analysis of their breathing rate, their minute ventilation, their lung clearance index, their peak expiratory flow rate, their forced vital capacity and their forced expiratory volume. Our finding demonstrated that aerosols of the HDP particles in this study were non-irritating to the respiratory tract of humans when exposed for 4 h.Reversal of morphine tolerance and dependence with intracerebroventricular injection of antiserum against enkephalinase. The kappa-selective opioid receptor antagonist nor-binaltorphimine (nor-BNI) was infused intracerebroventricularly (i.c.v.) in Sprague-Dawley rats to produce tolerance to
